

tp24 – world leaders in low energy lighting tp24, the Cambridgeshire based new home lighting specialist, are showcasing the latest developments in dedicated low energy at Interbuild 07 in Hall3/3a stand T85. The tp24 display will demonstrate that modern low energy lighting is compact, attractive and affordable.

tp24's range of over 200 exciting new fittings utilise the dedicated LI lamp and lamp holder system. Two new energy saving lamps are being introduced at the exhibition – the 9w tube and the micro, both exclusive to tp24. These superb new lamps allow greater scope for imaginative design and the creation of attractive fittings desirable to consumers. tp24's comprehensive selection of innovative lighting designs offers something suitable for all styles and for every room of the house.

The company, which specialises in providing lighting for builders' options packages, have developed their low energy range specifically to meet part L of the building regulations. tp24 also manufactures dedicated ceiling pendant sets, batten holder sets and down lights for fitting during construction.

The response to the conventional looking pendant set has been fantastic. "Our engineers and customers have been extremely positive," said Dean Barrett, Managing Director of Rolec.net, "our engineers find them quick and easy to install. We feel the end users will be far more likely to leave these fittings in place."

tp24 are fully committed to the research and development of low energy lighting. "Installing tp24 low energy light fittings will cut your energy consumption by up to 80% and save significant carbon emissions", said Liz MacGregor, tp24's Marketing Manager. "The lamps last up to 8000 hours so you can expect not to change one for 3-5 years. Builders are able to improve their carbon footprints and meet the growing demands of the climate conscious public."
